CORROBORATIVE TESTIMONY.

William Selling, 3404 Bismarck Street.
Mr. Selling, a stinner, with O. E. Koehn, at 224 S. Broadway, said to a reporter: "For three or four years I have been a sufferer from catarrh. I became weak and unambitious. I had a pain in my head and sometimes across my chest. I had a pain in my stomach and a full feeling after eating, although I ate but little. My nose seemed stopped up, and when I talked it sounded as if I was talking through it. I tried various remedies, but got no material assistance from them. The symptoms of my disease grew more aggravating, and I had less disposition and ability to work. In the winter the discharge of mucus was greater than in summer, and it seemed all the time as if I was suffering from a hard cold. This was my condition when I went to see Dr. McCoy. He told me that I had a bad case of catarrh, but that it was a curable one. Well, I went under his treatment, and the result you can see for yourself. I am a well man. There is not a trace of catarrh left."

In the Same Strain.
A reporter called on Mrs. Urberger at 1241 South Second street. She said: "About four years ago a weakness took hold of my lower limbs. Gradually a number of small openings filled with matter appeared on and below my knees, and I experienced the most intense pain. I called in a doctor, and he told me they were ulcers. They increased in size and discharged a yellowish watery matter. The bottom of the sores was red, and sometimes would bleed. The doctor's treatment healed the sores for a time, yet in the course of four or five weeks they would break out again. It hurt me to walk, and finally I was compelled to take my bed for weeks at a time. Visited several other doctors, but experienced no improvement. About a month ago I went under Dr. McCoy's treatment. Within two weeks I was a different woman. My knees and limbs are all right, and I can say now that I never felt better in my life."

POWDERLY'S QUESTIONS.

The press, having condemned the boycott as practiced by labor organizations, has asked by Mr. POWDERLY what it has to say of the boycott as practiced by the employers of labor.

Whoever is wrong, per se, is just as wrong when practiced by one person as by another, and we do not see how any candid man can uphold boycotting when practiced by employers and yet condemn it when practiced by employees.

But Mr. POWDERLY in his circular to editors puts a supposed case of a man boycotted by employees for being a member of an organization, and asks if the members of that organization are not justified in fighting the devil with fire, or, in other words, boycotting the boycotter. He might as well ask if the commission of one wrong does not justify the commission of another wrong by way of retaliation in kind—if the willful burning of Smith's house by Jones does not justify Smith in burning Jones' house, and if the whole fellowship of the Smiths should not thereupon take up the feud and fight it out on that line with the Joneses.

It is this tendency of mischief to breed mischief, of organization and aggressive coercion on one side to provoke retaliatory aggression on the other side, that magnifies the culpability of the original aggressor in such cases. When his victims pay him wrong for wrong they may be less culpable than he, but are not justified, except where they can make out a clear case of necessary self-defense. This they cannot do when they abandon the better and surer protection of the law and the ballot-box, and menace the peace and good order of society with a modernized edition of the old clan feuds and class fights of more barbarous times.

Workingmen have recently secured judgments for exemplary damages against railroads that black listed them. If the laws and the courts do not afford them sufficient protection in this respect, they control the ballot-box by a large majority, and can provide ample legal protection for themselves. In the meantime, whenever they go outside of the law and attempt to carry their point either by illegal coercion or by assailing employers with organized proscription in business, they always seem to get the worst of it in the long run. It invariably becomes a war upon other workingmen and upon small tradesmen, and alarms and arrays against a labor movement a mighty mass of citizens who would be its friends, if permitted, because they are far more closely allied to the wage-earners than to the capitalist class.

The people of South Dakota have solemnly resolved to enter upon the actual discharge of the duties and powers of a State, if Congress should adjourn without letting them into the Union. It is to be hoped that they will go further and enter into a treaty with the United States for the maintenance of friendly relations and the promotion of international commerce; but they should not try to impose a duty on goods imported from the United States.

THE BUTLER-ROSCREANS CONTROVERSY has brought to light some rather startling charges against BUTLER connected with his military career. He is accused, among other things, of selling medicine and supplies to the Confederates at an enormous profit. If these charges are vigorously urged it may become necessary to put Mr. CHARLES A. DANA on the stand to vindicate Gen. BUTLER'S integrity and patriotism.

THE NEW YORK SUN thinks that BLAINE would be the easiest Republican to defeat in 1898; but if BLAINE and CLEVELAND should both be renominated, which way would the Sun dip? That is what the public would like to know.

MAXWELL'S POVERTY.

His Visit to Pawnbroker Hess to Raise $5 on His Watch.

The Attempt to Dispose of His Magic Lantern Outfit.

A Penniless Condition Presumed Prior to Easter Sunday.

The Trunk Man on the Stand—Putting the Feller Casket Together Again—Porter Frails Describes the Appearance of Room 144 After Discovering the Body—To-day's Testimony in the Great Chloroforming Case.

There are several soft spots in the Maxwell jury. It is not difficult to read men's natures in their faces, and if I am not mistaken there are tender hearts throbbing under four or five of the vests that may be viewed in the jury-box.

A great share of Maxwell's hope is based upon the tendency of the jury, because he seems to feel keenly the serious tragic and next to desperate attitude which he holds—a stranger in a strange country.

The Youngest Spectator, with a large portion of the community demanding his life, and blind Justice waiting with ready weapon to administer the penalty, no matter how terrible his character; he feels that he is without friends, and his first aim in speaking or looking at people is to learn whether they are friendly to him or not.

A kindly face gives him hope and a soft word of encouragement makes him feel happy. Is there any reason then why he should not closely scan the faces of the men who hold his fate in their hands?

Innocent men have been convicted by stubborn, hard-hearted juries, and guilty men have gone free by a jury of soft-hearted men. Maxwell denied the story told by Head-walker Arlington, as to the accused's flippant remark about the cost of killing a man in this country.

"To me," said he, "the life of a negro in the heart of Africa is just as sacred and valuable as the life of Queen Victoria or President Cleveland. And as to murder," he continued, "I did not look at lightly, because I thought Judge Arnold was the chief dispenser of justice for that sort of work."

He said this with the ghastly trunk in front of him—almost under his nose—and looked into his big bulging eyes and wondered what there was behind them.

PROCEEDINGS IN COURT.
The Prosecution Forging a Strong Chain of Circumstances—New Testimony To-day.

Maggie Cuddy, the chambermaid, who was in Maxwell's room at the Southern Hotel between 1 and 2 p. m., Easter Sunday, 1898, and saw Preller, the last time he was seen alive, sitting slumped in an arm-chair near the window, was followed in the Maxwell trial yesterday by Miss Katie Clark, another chambermaid. Miss Clark testified that she was employed on the 300 floor, and identified a photograph of Preller as the man who was shot.

Maxwell likes the jury. He told me to-day that he liked their faces, and he believed that they would be fair, not only to him but to the State and would do justice to all concerned. He said this, mindful of the fact that he had once been a prisoner in the Missouri State Penitentiary, and that his mother and sister beyond the sea are waiting tremblingly every day and every night in their little English home at Sunnybank, Surrey.

testifying in reference to the magic lantern, Maxwell turned to me and said: "I had been so badly in need of money, that I had been told the lantern slides, which were more valuable than the lantern itself, and which I had with me, instead of waiting for the lantern to arrive."

I did not answer this question, but asked him to explain the pawnbroker's statement about pawning the watch and the lantern slides.

"Suppose," said he, "that I deny any such action—that I swear that I never offered to pawn my watch or anything else, isn't it possible that this gentleman may have been given up to me, just as many others were?"

I was charged with having done a great many things that I never did at all—at one time they said I had changed $400 or $500, Bank of England notes at one of your banks, and if the man who did this hadn't turned up they would have continued to think that the bank robber was myself still. Much has been printed about me, some of which is true and some false. I have not denied or tried to correct any of it."

The growing interest which ladies are taking in his case appears to delight Maxwell. The right side of the court-room inside the rails is given up to them, and there are stragglers in other parts of the room.

I suggested to Maxwell that the presence of so much youth and beauty augured good fortune, as I had never known a prisoner who enlisted the sympathies of the tender sex and caused them to rally to his assistance, as it were, during his most trying moments, that there wasn't a favorable conclusion to the trial.

This pleased Maxwell, and he turned clear around in his chair to count the strength of his charming allies.

As indicating the interest taken by the ladies, here is a list of some of Maxwell's courtship moments taken this morning, a messenger bringing it in with a box of cigars, which were distributed after the adjournment:

Maxwell read this little note and water welled up from his lower eye-lids.

His attention was divided, to-day, between a baby girl who sat on her father's knee and a variety actress who sat beside a well-known society man. He moralized about the child and was ecstatic about the actress' handsome face.

Later on he forgot the actress and thought about his dinner.

Charles Dickens' ghost ought to be a defendant in this case.

It was Dickens who gave Maxwell his ideas of Western American manners—Dickens and a lot of unfortunates whom he had heard talking about the "wild West" of the new world.

After reading the "American Notes" and hearing the tall stories that were told him by the men of his country, he gleaned the idea that every man in Western America was a walking arsenal and shooting was an everyday occurrence.

He had never heard of Jesse James, though. Maxwell denied the story told by Head-walker Arlington, as to the accused's flippant remark about the cost of killing a man in this country.

"To me," said he, "the life of a negro in the heart of Africa is just as sacred and valuable as the life of Queen Victoria or President Cleveland. And as to murder," he continued, "I did not look at lightly, because I thought Judge Arnold was the chief dispenser of justice for that sort of work."

While in the chair he said he was a surgeon in the Turkish army, and could speak French.
